Challenges of Translating Classical Tamil Poetry into French: The Tiruppavai as Example

VASUMATHI BADRINATHAN

Abstract

This article focuses on classical Tamil poetry, represented by the Tiruppavai of Andal. The article seeks to understand the challenges of translating from Tamil into French, of a poetry that is non-contemporary, and which communicates layered meanings relating to religion, metaphysics, spirituality, nature and simply, the self. While every literary translation poses difficulties, translating classical Tamil poetry comes with a set of challenges by way of being spatially, temporally, contextually and even to an extent, linguistically removed from the present. Which route should the translator take: Faithful reproduction, brave reinvention or a middle path? The corpus for this article is drawn from two translations in French of the Tiruppavai that are studied and compared in this perspective.

Keywords: Poetry, Tiruppavai, Tamil, French, Translation.

Introduction

The world of translation is replete with contemporary works of literature. Literary works in translation belonging to earlier periods, though not absent, find a negligible place in this scene apart from academic circles. The reasons for this could be many. The difficulties imposed by the cultural ethos and mysticism of India as a whole could be a challenge, coupled with its linguistic complexities. The lack of interest for poetry in readers could be another factor. The religiosity and spiritual element in classical poetry could be yet another reason which publishers fear may not resonate with contemporary readers and which makes publishing such translation difficult. This article relies on a corpus of two translations from Tamil into French of the Tiruppavai: one by the renowned Indologist and scholar, Jean Filliozat in 1972 and the other by this author in 2019. In the light of what is explained above, it is not surprising that there is a gap of forty-seven years between the two translations with no known translations of this work in French in the interim period to the best of our knowledge.

Background of the Tiruppavai: Context and Content

A chef-d’œuvre of Tamil literature, the Tiruppavai is a gem in itself. It remains a centrepiece of Sri Vaishnava philosophy propounded by Ramanuja, which rests on devotion to Vishnu as the supreme god. Andal is the only female amongst the twelve Alwars of Tamil Nadu, poet-saint-philosophers of Tamil Nadu. In her incredible life as one passionately in love with Vishnu, she ultimately unites directly with him into the altar. The Alwars lived between the 6th and 9th centuries and their collective poetry of four thousand verses is known as the Nalayira Divya Prabandham. Each individual poem or verse is called a Pasuram. The Alwars led the Bhakti movement in Tamil Nadu and their poetry is hailed as Tamil Marai or the Tamil Vedas – representing the esoteric and philosophical values of the Vedas in a tongue commonly understood in the land.

The Tiruppavai is composed of thirty verses of eight lines each. Each octave is replete with a delightful simplicity that belies their profundity; the verses shine with literary and philosophical connotations. There are several commentaries on the philosophical content of the Tiruppavai. Though the Tiruppavai includes thirty different poems, they are gathered together in one single unit which flows cohesively from one poem to the other, like chapters of a novel. Therefore, one could read them individually or chronologically from start to end. In either case, they remain beautifully coherent. The land is Gokulam, of cowherds, milkmaids and Krishna. The young girls wish to perform the \textit{pavai nombu}, a ritual for the prosperity of the land and their own lives. In every poem, the group of girls travels from house to house, waking up the sleeping damsels and preparing them for the ritualistic bath. Their final goal is to reach Krishna, which they do after appealing to the mansion guardian, his father, his consort and finally to Krishna himself. Acclaimed as poetry of the highest order of the Visistadvaita philosophy, the poems are one of ‘awakening’ at many levels. Within each poem dwells a world in itself, complete with its multisensorial imagery and poetic elements. The Tiruppavai is a song of the exterior, much like an Impressionist painting. It draws vivid pictures of nature, the countryside, fields, seasons, birds, water, colours, the sun, and of the moon, the planets, cowherds, milk, butter, yoghurt. It could not be more complete in its pastoral description appealing to all senses. It combines a simple language with poetic elegance and depth. There is even one poem in dialogue form.

The Tiruppavai is also characterised by a strong musical element. Coming from an oral tradition, it was meant to be sung, and still continues to hold its position of pride within the Carnatic music repertoire. It remains a much-in-use poetry, recited regularly by the devout of the Sri Vaishnava tradition that especially gains momentum in the month of Margali (the winter month of Margashirsha). While many classical and ancient works have fallen into oblivion, Andal has continued to hold her sway over translators especially in English even in recent times (Chabbria, Shankar 2015; Venkatesan, 2010).

\textbf{The Problematic of the Dual Complexities of Tamil \& French}

Having explained the backdrop of the Tiruppavai and its fundamental spiritual and philosophical character, these very elements do not make it any easier for the translator. The Tiruppavai takes us to the time of divinity, of a time when God walked with man. Hence, we are dealing with poetry of a different level where Andal seeks salvation and leads the reader towards this ultimate objective. Taking a text such as the Tiruppavai into a foreign language, in this case, French, it makes a doubly challenging. How do you maintain a safe balance without much gaping cultural fractures and still keep it acceptable to a Francophone reader of target language? The Tiruppavai as the source text (ST) is a poetic document replete with complexities for the translator. Not just linguistic, but context, time and space-driven challenges too. The Tiruppavai has come down since ages, intact in a fairly homogenized version through the oral tradition. For academic purposes, we refer to a 1988 edition (Krishnaswami Iyengar) of the Tiruppavai as ST. We shall consider some excerpts of translated text (TT) from both the versions in question in this article and analyse the same. All re-translations in English from French in this article are those of this author and are provided to facilitate understanding for readers not familiar with French language.

Keeping Close to the Original

Right from the inaugural poem, Filliozat announces his fidelity to the ST. He remains charmingly close to Tamil culture in his choice of ‘Yacotai’ (Filliozat 1972: 6) for Yashoda, (Yashodai ilanshingam - the metaphor of Yashoda’s lion cub) adding the typically Tamil ‘ai’ suffix while referring to Yashoda, the ‘ai’ also communicating ‘belonging to’. This translator has simply chosen ‘Yashoda’ for its universality in her TT, two variations, driven solely by the translators’ choice.

Let us look at some words that occur frequently in the Tiruppavai. It is not impossible to translate words as ‘nai (ghee), ‘kuttuvilakku’ (lamp) into French. Filliozat simply uses ‘beurre’ (butter) for ‘nai’ (ghee or clarified butter) (Filliozat 1972: 2) and ‘lampadaire’ (lamp on a stand) (Filliozat 1972: 20) for kuttuvilakku. However, this translator maintains the source text word as the translation did not quite reflect the totality of the word in her eyes. Are we simply seeking equivalence of a semantic order or are we looking for communicating the essence of the poem? Some detailed explanation here would be in order. The kuttuvilakku, to anyone familiar and raised in Tamil land and culture would associate this lamp to a characteristic shape, design, even a certain grace with feminine tones, coming from Tamil artistry. A kuttuvilakku from Tamil Nadu is very different from the Kerala oil lamps for example. Merely translating kuttuvilakku into ‘lamp’ for this translator, did not sufficiently evoke the beauty of this lamp or its design which plays an important role in this poem which is by far the most sensuous and intimate of all the thirty poems. The kuttuvilakku lights up subtly and sensuously the bed chamber, where the divine couple lies in serenity. So much so, that Andal chooses to start the poem with kuttuvilakku. Here are the beginning verses of this poem-

Pasuram 19 (Nalayira Divya Prabandham: 84)

Kuttuvilak eriya kottuk kaal kattil mel Mettenra panja sayanathin mel eri

A la lueur du kuttuvilakku, allongé sur un lit moelleux aux pieds d’ivoire (Badrinathan, 2019 : 47).

This translator being of Tamil origin chooses therefore to maintain the source text word as seen above, with a footnote explanation.

Nevertheless, Filliozat is not forgetful of the usefulness of source language words and source text words. He uses source text words for proper names, for living beings and also for elements of nature, some examples being Narayana (Pasuram 1), Sarnaga (Vishu’s bow, Pasuram 4), ‘madhavi’ (type of creeper, Pasuram 18). This translator however is more liberal with use of source text words as for example Parai (drum, Pasuram 1), Chakra, Panchajanya, Saranga (disc, conch, bow – all names of Vishnu’s arms, Pasuram 4), ambal (type of flower, pasuram 14), madhavi (type of creeper, Pasuram 18), kuttuvilakku (lamp, Pasuram 19), pallandu (chant of praise, Pasuram 26) and source culture words such as nombu (the special ritual, Pasuram 2), kasumalai (necklace of gold coins, Pasuram 7), tulsi8 (the sacred plant, Pasuram 10). This choice of source language words is justified by their emblematic names and the iconic role they play in Tamil culture even today. A kasumalai cannot have any other form – it is necessarily a necklace with gold coins, nombu is the traditional feminine ritual in vigour even to this day. Is the tulsi translatable or does it fit well in a translated equivalent with all the symbolism it is associated with? That is also why this translator prefers to keep the key word ‘parai’ instead of ‘drum’ as the parai, is a polysemic leitmotif in the Tiruppavai. It is at once the drum, the object and also symbol of deliverance; it is both the means and the end.

However, code mixing has been a conscious choice in both translations. It does not imply that the translator’s despair for lack of words but use the strategy deliberately to enhance the quality of the TT and render it as close to the original texture as possible. A strategy that Venuti (1995) would not be unhappy about, as it sufficiently ‘foreignises’ translation.

8 Although Tulsi is a Tamil word, துணி is the ancient Tamil term used in the poem to mean Tulsi.
Form versus Content

The length of the lines in translating poetry is a question of concern. Each of Andal’s poems is an octave. Filliozat remains loyal to the eight lines. This translator has extended it to ten lines, as French language does not comfortably allow ease of translation in brevity. While some poems lend themselves to be fitted into the eight-line sequence, many do not. In order to maintain uniformity, this translator chose to maintain the translation into French in ten-line stanzas. Filliozat, for his part, remains in the eight-line limit and numbers them verses, but his lines double up. For example, in Pasuram 14, this is how he extends line 2 of the poem (Filliozat 1972: 14)

Senkayuneer vai negindu ambal vai koombinak kaan
Les corolles des lotus rouges se sont ouvertes et les corolles des lotus blancs se sont fermées. Regarde.
The petals of the red lotus have bloomed and the petals of the white lotus have closed. Look.

Or

In Pasuram 2 (Filliozat 1972: 2).

Vaiyathu vaiveergaal namum nam pavaikku(ch)
Seiyyum girisaigal keliro parkadalul
Vous qui vivez dans le monde, n’écouteriez-vous pas les actions que nous devons accomplir pour notre vœu? - Sur l’océan du lait
You who live in this world, won’t you listen to the actions that we must accomplish for our vow? - Upon the ocean of milk

When Prose Meets Poetry

In many instances, Filliozat adopts simplicity and straightforwardness. In Pasuram 26, Filliozat (1972: 26) translates thus.

Melayar seivanangal venduvana kettiyel
Si tu demandes les choses nécessaires aux actes des personnes éminentes
If you ask for the things needed for the act from eminent persons

In Pasuram 11, Filliozat (1972: 12) willingly introduces a conjugated verb which lends it a solid prosaic quality.

Ils partent pour détruire la force des ennemis et combattent
They set out to destroy the strength of the enemies and fight.

The ST however eschews this succession of verbs (Nalayira Divya Prabandham 1988: 82)

Settraar tiralayiya senru serucheyyum
This translator’s version (Badrinathan 2019 : 31)

Et leur bravoure à vaincre l’ennemi dans d’illustres guerres
And their valour in triumphing over the enemy in illustrious wars

In this case, this translator remains close to the original text and attempts to retain the poetic value. Another example is Pasuram 5. For the line ‘vaayinaal paadi’ which conveys ‘mouthing praises’, Filliozat (1972: 6) once again remains with the literal translation.
Challenges of Translating Classical Tamil Poetry…

Vaaayinaal paadi manathinaal sindhikka(p)
Quand, chantant de la bouche nous pensons à Lui par l’esprit
When, singing by mouth we think of Him through our minds.

Here, the logic is evident, as like Andal, herself, Filliozat insists on the verbal chant and the simultaneous mental devotion that go hand in hand (mouth and mind). While in the other translation, the translator (Badrinathan 2019: 19) decides to forego this element of contrast by using the verb ‘sing’.

Nous Lui chanterons des louanges
Nous graverons dans nos pensées Son souvenir
We shall sing his praises
We shall engrave in our thoughts His memories

In some instances, Filliozat (1972:12) permits a rupture of sentence which rings an odd tone semantically. Like in Pasuram 11.

Toutes les amies de l’entourage sont venues, dans ta
Cour elles sont entrées et tandis qu’elles chantent…
All neighbouring friends have come in your
Courtyard they entered and while they sing...

Is the intention to remain close to Andal who resorts at times to similar constructions? For example, in Pasuram 3, Andal

Thengaday pukkirandu seerta mulai patri
Vanga kudam niraikkum vallal perum pasukkal
Patri vaanga, refers to the act of milking and both words go together. Filliozat seems to imitate this model in the example mentioned supra.

In Pasuram 16, the girls entreat the door keeper to let them into the mansion of Nandagopa. Here is the literal translation of the ST (Nalayira Divya Prabandham 1988: 84).

\text{வாயால் முன்னமும்மும் மாட்ரே அம்மா நிய}

\text{Vaayaal munnamunnam maatrade amma nee}

With your mouth first, do not refuse, mother

It is common in Tamil to use the idiomatic phrase ‘with your mouth’ to mean ‘to speak’, ‘to utter’, and to ‘have a tongue’ to mean someone who talks but does not act. Filliozat prefers the literal.

\text{Ne refuse pas d’abord de la bouche, ô Père}

\text{Do not refuse with your mouth, O Father.}

Interestingly, he even replaces ‘Amma’, or mother, with ‘père’ or father. The door keeper being a male, was it that which prompted Filliozat to choose the masculine? His choice he explains is based on the explanation that ‘amma’ is a vocative of ‘amman’ – maternal uncle or father; here the guardian of the door (Filliozat 1972: 48).

Another example would be Pasuram 14 (Nalayira Divya Prabandham 1988: 83). Here is first, the literal translation in English.

\text{எங்களை முன்னமும் எழுப்ப்வண்ண வைப்பு பேசும்}

\text{Engalai munnam ezhuppuvan vai pesum}

Us you wished to first awaken, your mouth said

Girl wake up! Do you only have a tongue
Filliozat (1972: 14)

Toi qui disait de bouche que tu nous éveillerais la première,
O notre sœur, éveille-toi. Tu n’as pas honte? Toi qui [n’] as [que] la langue
You who said with your mouth that you would be the first to awaken us
O sister of ours, wake up. Aren’t you ashamed? You, who only has a tongue?

This translator (Badrinathan 2019: 37)

Toi qui te vantais hier d’être la première à nous réveiller, Lève-toi donc! Tes promesses sont trompeuses
You who boasted yesterday of being the first one to wake us up Wake up yourself, won’t you! Your promises are a betrayal

A scholarly, veteran Indologist and translator, it is evident that Filliozat did not make these choices arbitrarily. Through his detailed notes, commentary and analysis of the Tiruppavai, one can conjecture that Filliozat wished to be clear, concise, and conventional in expression when communicating the intentions of Andal to a typical reader of the French translation who is geographically and culturally distant from the ST. The thrust of the translation is distinctly on the concerns of correct communication and scholarship, rather than a preoccupation with its poetic elegance.

Poetic Characteristics of the Tiruppavai

Andal’s construction of her verses is invested with musicality. Let us see how this offers itself to translation. The famous Pasuram 4 (Nalayira Divya Prabandham 1988: 81) paints images of rain, thunder and colour. The musicality is further enhanced with the richly alliterative and assonantal verses. This poem, Aazhi mazhai kanna, is anaphoric in its use of ayi and assonantal in its use of ya/zha (இ) the singular phonetic sound of Tamil.

To counter the impossibility of maintaining these poetic devices, this translator (Badrinathan 2019: 17) uses verb endings in the TT. The imperative in French, ending with the ‘ez’ ( pronounced [e] ) gives the translation a semblance of the power that is vested in the ST.

Plongez dans les profondeurs des océans,

Puisez pleinement, résonnez ensuite dans les cieux en tonnerre,

Vêtez-vous de noir, telle la cause première,
Resplendissez en nuées d’éclairs

Rugissez fermement comme le Panchajanya

Déchaînez-vous sur la terre comme une pluie incessante

[de flèches décochées de son Saranga,

Dive into the depths of the oceans

Draw freely only to resonate again as thunder in the skies

Dress up in dark hues, like the primordial cause

Radiate in lightening streaks

Roar firmly like the Panchajanya

Unleash yourself upon the earth

Like an unstoppable rain of arrows released by his Saranga

Filliozat (1972: 4) however, goes straight to the point. His use of the second person singular, the familiar ‘tu’ (you), reveals a disarming familiarity with the main character of the poem and also thereby investing the translation with a rhythmic energy.

O toi dont les yeux font une pluie d’océan, ne cache rien dans ta main

Entre dans l’océan, puise, élève-toi en tonnant,

Devenu noir de corps à l’image du Premier Etre des âges,

Oh you whose eyes are an ocean of rain, hide nothing in your hand

Enter into the ocean, draw from it, arise thundering

Having become darkened in body like the Primordial Being of all ages
In Pasuram 11 (Nalayira Divya Prabandham 1988: 82), Andal plays on the repetition of the consonne ‘tra’ at the beginning of each verse.

The clever use of ‘t+ra’ (the hard consonant ṭ) in Tamil gives to the texture of the verses, a ‘crispy’ effect, which corresponds to Andal’s sharp injunctions to the lazy, sleeping girl in the story, exhorting her to rise and accompany her friends to the bathing ritual of the nombu ceremony. Neither Filliozat nor this translator has reproduced the effect of the Tamil ‘t+ra’. In Pasuram 19, less alliterations around ‘k’ and ‘t’, suggest the warmth and tenderness of the bed chamber, the beautiful breasts of Nappinnai, consort of Krishna, lying on the comfortable bed.

The first four verses are given below. Filliozat (1972: 20) translates as follows:

Kuttuvillak eriya kottukkal kattil mel
Meddenra pancha sayanathin mel eri
Kothalar poonkuyal Nappinnai kongai mel
Vaithuk kidanda malar maarba vai tiravai

While the lamp burns, on the bed with ivory legs
Resting on a soft couch having five qualities
The breast of Nappinnai’s who wears on her hair blossomed flowers
Reclining on your large chest spread out, oh you, open your mouth!
Filliozat’s play of contrast of the French phonetic sounds- ‘oo’ [u] and ‘u’ [y], give the verse the warmth and lilt of the ST. This translator (Badrinathan 2019: 47) uses the consonant ‘l’ to achieve the same effect.

*A la lueur du kuttuvilakku, allongé sur un lit moelleux aux pieds d’ivoire

Tu te reposes, Ta large poitrine étendue

Comme une fleur épanouie sur les seins de Nappinnai

Aux cheveux embellis de grappes de fleurs éclôses

In the glow of the kuttuvilakku, reclining on a soft bed with ivory legs

You rest, Your broad chest spread out

Like a blossomed flower on Nappinnai’s breast

She who wears bunches of bloom in her hair

Neither of the above two translations have however captured Andal’s generous juxtaposition of ‘k’.

Andal uses an astonishing range of poetic techniques. In Pasuram 24 (Nalayira Divya Prabandham 1988: 85), a panegyric verse, six of the eight verses ends with Potri (praise be to) (adi potri, tiral potri, pugazh potri, kazhal potri, gunam potri, vel potri) lending it a rich flavour of incantation. Both Filliozat and this translator have used ‘toï qui’ (you who) in repetition; Filliozat uses ‘hommage’ (praise) frequently. This translator, in addition to ‘gloire’ (glory/praise be) in repetition, also uses the past participle of the verbs to maintain the effect of litany.

*அல்லை தென்கு அனுருத்தாம் அடே பைந்து

உலக அளதா*
Anru ivvulagam alaindai adi potri
Senrengudh tenni Lankai setraai tiral potri
Pondra chakatam udaihai pugal potri

This translator (Badrinathan 2019: 56)

Toi qui autrefois as enjambé l’univers, gloire à Tes pieds !
Toi qui as triomphé dans le sud, au Lanka, gloire à Ta valeur !
Toi qui as écrasé la roue d’un coup de pied, gloire à Ta renommée !

You who once measured the universe, glory be to Thy feet!
You who triumphed in the south in Lanka, glory be to Thy valour!
You who crushed the wheel in one kick, glory be Thy fame!

While this option was relatively easier, other poems pose some veritable challenges. Note the softness created by the repetitive ‘l’ in the entire 26th pasuram - Maale, melaiyar, nyalathai, paalanna, polvana, saala, kola, aalinilaya. Is it even possible to truly reflect this stylistic impact in translation? Neither Filliozat nor this translator could do justice to this element in their translations. The beauty of such syllables can only be perceived, read and felt in the ST. Same is the case of the closing poem which plays on the sound ‘nga’ in every first word.

Orality in Translation

How does one convey a verse that was never meant to be written but rather sung, recited, communicated as was the Tiruppavai? In order to conserve and emphasise the oral nature of the poetry, this translator opts for inversing the order of the verses whereas Filliozat maintains the source word itself in the translation as in Pasuram 7.

Keechu Keechu enru engum anai chathan kalandu

Pesina pecharavam kaytilayo pei penney?

“Keechu keechu” the anaichathan birds all of them together

Their talks don’t you hear mad girl?

This translator (Badrinathan 2019 : 23)

O toi insensée ! Engourdie comme une fille possédée,

N’entends-tu pas le verbiage incohérent des oiseaux en réunion?

Oh you, senseless one ! Benumbed like a possessed girl

Don’t you hear the incoherent chatter of birds that crowd together?

Filliozat (1972: 8):

« Kis-kis » font partout les mainates en se réunissant ;

N’entends-tu pas le bruit des propos qu’ils se tiennent ? Fille stupide.

Keechu-keechu say the birds getting together all over

Don’t you hear the noise of the discourse they are holding?

Foolish girl!

“Keechu keechu” is an onomatopoeia reflecting the noisy chattering of the birds. In commonly spoken Tamil, it is also used to represent a shrill intonation. Andal’s closeness to the spoken word reflects in Filliozat who maintains the onomatopoeia. However, adhering closely as he always has to the ST, he respects the same order of verses with a loyal translation.

Let us here draw attention to the distinction that Nida (1964) proposes between ‘formal’ and ‘dynamic’ equivalence in translation. The latter by nature is dynamic, allows for freedom of the translator which infers that the translator in his preoccupation of making sense to the receptor, makes suitable alterations to the source text. Formal equivalence, on the other hand can be interpreted as the no-nonsense kind, the logical one. Such a translation naturally by its intent, stresses on fidelity towards the source text. In both the translations in question in this article, the translators blend the formal and the dynamic, though Filliozat tends to lean towards the formal. The choice of ‘formal’ or ‘dynamic’ depends largely on the purpose of the translation. This brings us to the objective of the translation. Filliozat’s translation is of an academic nature. This is evident in the study of examples analysed above. His translation is preceded by a seventeen-page introduction to the Tiruppavai followed by almost sixty pages of detailed notes of the pasurams and plates of temple frescoes of the representation of the Tiruppavai. Every line of each poem is numbered for easy reference. This leaves no doubt about the objective of the translation which is to bring it as faithfully as possible to the reader with a well-researched scholarly publication. The second translation, which is by this author, does not share the same preoccupation. It is meant to help the common reader of French savour the beauty of Bhakti poetry while retaining the ST’s flavour in the most convincing manner possible. With an introduction by the translator and a note on the Tiruppavai by Sri Aurobindo, this translation offers a fresh look at the Tiruppavai after nearly five decades.

Translating the Untranslatable
The surface simplicity of the Tiruppavai belies the difficulties that unfold in translation as we have noted. Let us consider the last line of the octave that closes every poem of the thirty poems. ‘Elor empava’ is the refrain that is systematically preceded by a different prefix in each of the poems, changing subtly its meaning each time and investing it with a different depth each time. Scholars have submitted that this refrain is polysemic in offering many shades of symbolism. In this case, Filliozat settles for ‘prends en considération notre vœu’ (consider our vow). This translator chooses ‘Notre prière unique en sera fructueuse’ (Our unique prayer will thus be fruitful), achieving an alexandrine verse. It seems virtually impossible to translate this clever line which changes in hue in every poem, depending on its preceding words (arulelor empavai, maghindélor empavai, kulirndélor empavai and so on) making it a translator’s riddle.

Translating Tiruppavai throws up many questions, often unanswerable. How does one maintain the symbolic value of the Hindu ‘bath’ which is fundamental in the nombu ritual of the Tiruppavai- ‘neeradal’, or bath, is layered in many meanings, including sexual bliss? How does one transfer the typical Tamil or pan-Indian expression ‘at the feet of’, to underline blessing, surrender to a higher order and not servitude? Or yet how does one communicate the Hindu symbolism relating to the different parts of the day, like dawn? How does one attribute to ‘little parrot’, ‘idiotic girl’, a connotation of affection? Or hold the lotus as the flower of beauty, of divinity? Or the idiomatic expression ‘you only have a tongue’, alluding to one who speaks a lot but does not act? Or the paronomasia communicated by Andal through the word ‘oruthi’ (Pasuram 25) which signifies both ‘she’ and ‘the other’ (referring to Krishna’s biological mother and foster mother) at the same time. What a puzzle Andal conveys gently in a woman-led set of poems! The Tiruppavai is a veritable cultural conundrum for the translator. The translator has to weave through the verses, much like the cowherd girls themselves, each undertaking their journey towards their final destination.

Both translations herein discussed the Tiruppavai, though very different, share some striking similarities. Neither is very adventurous nor contemporary in its approach. There are no neologisms or out-of-the-box interpretations. In this respect, both translations remain loyal to the ST, though in different ways. But gaps as compared to the ST are a given and do appear in both the translations, which Venuti (1995) confirms are the very essence of translation between two languages- looking for similarities where dissimilarities abound. Moreover, to refer to the oft-used expression, traduttore traditore - translation is betrayal. But we can once again take recourse to Nida (1964) who clarifies that a complete exactitude cannot be achieved in translation. Mimicking would lead to disastrous results. So, we translate what we feel comes closest, sounds logical and thereby remain “safe”.

Conclusion

It is evident that much as poetry is an individual and solitary activity. Translation is one too. It stems from a subjective interpretation of the poem, of the words, of the universe represented therein. It is by no means a dialectical position between the author on one side and the translator on the other. Translation is as much a work of art for the translator as it is for the author and as Spivak (1993: 183) expresses, “it is the most intimate part of reading”. The original work passes through the filter of the translator’s sensibilities in order to convert itself into another text. In that sense, a translation is an art of creativity, of approximation, of interpretation. Hence, two translations will never be the same, and it would only be the better for it. Moreover, the translator is a mediator. In both the studied translations of the Tiruppavai in this article, the translators have essayed to build a bridge between the reader and the source text on a subject seemingly simple, but with culturally heavy concepts that on the one hand gives the freedom of interpretation in translation and on the other hand restrain it (Venuti 2013). We could say that the translator occupies the ‘third space’ that Bhabha (1994) envisaged, close to the source text, yet distant as it from one language to the other and creates a new translated text which lies in between, a new text that is retold centuries later to a new audience and still meaningful. It is as much an activity of interculturality as it as a to and fro between two texts in two languages and a world of alterity. This duality of the translated text is its very privilege. Both Filliozat and this translator situate themselves in this intercultural interlingual space. Having argued thus, it can be concluded that literary translation, and especially that of poetry belonging to another era, certainly poses challenges but they are a necessary hurdle to cross in the interest of literature and its wider reach through the medium of translation.

Note: All retranslations into English of the French translations are done by the author.
